

OSHA Seeking $700,000 In Fines For Sinclair Oil

MEAD GRUVER, Associated Press

Wyoming state safety regulators have announced that they are seeking $707,000 in fines against Sinclair Oil Corporation after alleging 22 safety violations at the company's refinery in south-central Wyoming, including a toxic gas release that sickened dozens of workers in May. The bulk of the fines — $420,000 — against Salt Lake City-based Sinclair are for what the Wyoming Occupational Safety and Health Administration Division classifies as "willful" safety violations.

The division said the violations include failing to properly address releases of toxic gases. One release of sulfur dioxide at the refinery in the tiny town of Sinclair on May 7 sickened about 35 workers, including two who were taken to the hospital for evaluation, Wyoming OSHA Administrator John Ysebaert said. The exposure happened when the prevailing wind didn't carry the gas away from the plant like usual, Ysebaert added. "It blew the fumes, the gases, back into the plant," he said.

The state agency also says Sinclair failed to fix an emergency eye wash station, despite three previous citations, or develop safe operating procedures for two systems at the refinery. Sinclair didn't immediately respond to messages seeking clarification on whether it intends to pay the fines. In a statement, Sinclair Vice President Clint Ensign said the company is working in good faith with state safety officials. "Many of these concerns have been corrected or are in the process of being mitigated," he said.

Ysebaert said the state OSHA office recognizes that effort. "There's so much for them to do at this time, and they are trying to really address everything," he said. "But it's quite a task." Wyoming refineries, including Sinclair, have been meeting regularly since last year to discuss ways to improve safety. Representatives of Governor Matt Mead's office have taken part. "Officials from the company assured me they are making strides and will continue to do so," Mead said in a statement through his spokesman.

Recent safety and environmental problems at the Sinclair refinery have been numerous. Last year, three fires at the refinery injured seven workers. The state OSHA office assessed more than $200,000 in fines for those accidents. In 2011, the state reached a $5.4 million settlement with Sinclair for spills into a pond on the refinery site that killed nearly 150 birds. More than 200 birds had to be rescued. In 2009, the refinery was the scene of one of the biggest spills in Wyoming history when the floating roof of a storage tank sank and punctured the tank's bottom. More than 2.7 million gallons of gasoline-grade petrochemicals leaked onto the refinery grounds.

The Sinclair website says the refinery received the Gold Award for Achievement in Safety in 2005 from the American Fuel and Petrochemical Manufacturers, then called the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association.

OSHA Seeking $700,000 In Fines For Sinclair Oil

Published on Chem.Info (<http://www.chem.info>)

Source URL (retrieved on 03/05/2015 - 2:38am):

http://www.chem.info/news/2013/10/osha-seeking-700000-fines-sinclair-oil?qt-most_popular=1